Three of five governor hopefuls endorse statewide approach to cellphones in classrooms

By Makenzie Huber
South Dakota Searchlight

Three candidates hoping to be South Dakota's next governor support a statewide policy or law banning cellphones from school classrooms. Another said the decision should be left to local school districts, while a potential candidate is seeking local input on the issue. Most school districts in South Dakota already have a policy in place that doesn't allow cellphones in classrooms. About one-third of school districts take the further step of removing or locking away cellphones during class or school hours, based on a South Dakota Searchlight survey of superintendents and analysis of published school policies. South Dakota's lone U.S. Rep. Dusty Johnson, a Republican, announced three days after the publication of Searchlight's story that, if elected governor next year, he would seek a statewide prohibition on student cellphone access during class time. "The state constitution makes it clear that kids should have quality education," Johnson told Searchlight. "The state government setting a broad-stroke policy and then having the execution of that strategy and management done at the local level will give us the best of both worlds." South Dakota is one of 24 states to not implement a statewide policy or law to ban or limit cellphone use in classrooms. State lawmakers considered a statewide effort last legislative session, but held off after school administrators said they'd prefer to determine policies at the local level. The Legislature instead passed a resolution encouraging school boards to implement such policies. According to a 2024 Pew Research Center survey, 72 percent of U.S. high school teachers say cellphone distraction is a major problem in the classroom. Some research suggests student performance improves after schools ban cellphones.

Other candidates weigh in Two other announced candidates for governor said they support efforts to establish a statewide law or policy removing cellphones from classrooms. South Dakota House Speaker Jon Hansen, R-Dell Rapids, would support a statewide policy to ensure students focus "on learning, not on distractions" and foster healthier social interactions. Democrat Robert Arnold, a 20-year-old college student who said he plans to run for governor, said a statewide policy or law would benefit students, but added that other efforts would be more impactful on student wellbeing, including providing universal free lunch and ensuring the federal Department of Education remains intact. Arnold said Johnson should support those efforts. "Not a peep from him about policies that will have a real impact on our people, but he'll of course propose legislation that at least makes it look like he cares about our children's education," Arnold said in an emailed statement. Aberdeen businessman and Republican Toby Doe-den said phones in classrooms are "roadblocks" to education and a "breeding ground" for negative influences and distractions. But he said school boards should address the issue. "Allowing state leaders to mandate individual policy changes at the local level would set a terrible precedent and is an obvious constitutional overreach," Doe-den said in a text message. "As governor, I would absolutely lean on our local school boards to ban cellphones from the classrooms." Current Republican Gov. Larry Rhoden has not announced his intention to run, but is expected to enter the race. The Rhoden administration is asking school leaders if they prefer cellphone policies that come from the local or state level, spokesperson Josie Harms said in an emailed statement.

First Lady Sandy Rhoden spent the first few months of the Rhoden administration visiting schools to talk about the consequences of using cellphones during school hours. Students at Platte-Geddes School District, the first in the state to lock away student cellphones during the school day three years ago, said the restriction improved relationships and academics, the first lady said in a statement. "Our students have so much to gain, and the constant distraction impedes their ability to learn," she said. School administrator representative encourages local control Rob Monson, executive director of School Administrators of South Dakota, said school administrators prefer to handle the issue themselves. He surveyed members of his organization last year, when legislators considered introducing a bill. "I think most school districts are doing what they feel they should and what's best for their school districts and patrons," Monson said. Monson added that if a bill is introduced this legislative session, his organization will likely oppose it. Johnson hopes the Legislature passes a bill this winter setting a statewide standard, saying it's a "no-brainer."
